

Building on strong foundations

Charting a new path forward

Making support functions pay for themselves

As organisations grow their businesses, it is important that the management ensures:

- Leadership focus on business growth drivers instead of operating non-core functions
- Business is equipped and staffed appropriately to manage support functions, and they have the ability to be flexible to match the needs of the business during variable business cycles
- The support functions build their technology capability to add value through insights and data analytics, and in some senses become a profit center on their own

As businesses are pressured to deal with cost and growth issues, we observe that business are engaging service organizations to take care of their non-core business functions, to allow management to focus on business goals. Typically, it is accounting, Tax, IT and HR functions that are widely outsourced since these are the areas that constitute the majority of cost and headcount as far as non core activities are concerned.

The drivers for deciding whether to outsource or not vary by organization, but we have provided below some key aspects that have a bearing on the decision

- Level of difficulty in building and operating an internal finance function e.g. retention of key talent, continuous training, offering growth to employees and cost pressures
- Costs and reputational implications in the case of lapses in critical compliances
- Need for quality reporting on a timely manner
- Building process efficiency in order to be able to manage increased volumes at a lower per transaction cost
- Integration of technology capability into processes especially in the areas of data analytics to enhance the value proposition of non core activities

To be able to outsource these activities, organisations go through a quick analysis, typically start with a few processes in some key areas and then expand the range and scale of outsourced activities based on their experience.
