Managing a mobile workforce

The onset of COVID-19 has tightened border controls and given rise to reciprocal bilateral travel arrangements. Having employees operating remotely across borders not only places greater demands on international human resource teams, it also increases the risk of compliance. Managing compensation, tax compliance and global mobility thus becomes more costly, complex and time-consuming. It is increasingly important for organisations to understand the combination of options to get an employee onboard.

Business continuity across borders

The ability to better manage its mobile workforce is an essential part of any organisation's key operational requirements. Policy setting, operational management, tracking, business continuity management for travellers and reporting need to be in place to ensure uninterrupted business activities.

Migration and border controls

Managing a global workforce means having to observe different, complex and fast-changing immigration policies worldwide. With the increasing enforcement of immigration laws and severe penalties for non-compliance, companies need to be more diligent than ever in managing their global workforce.

Mobility solutioning

The right person is a person at the right location, at the right time. Having the right employee onsite requires a coordination of in-house and outsourcing efforts. Organisations without a global team will have to rely on other options, such as engaging subject matter experts to deliver bespoke solutions and manage end-to-end solutions for them.

Performance and incentives

Virtual performance discussions are becoming the norm. Companies will need to learn how to develop and manage performance and related incentives as well as compliance requirements across multiple jurisdictions.

Work from anywhere

Even before the global pandemic, workforce became more mobile and virtual than before. Remote working is the new norm. While this is inevitable, it is certain that governments will step up controls along with the reopening of borders. Travellers will face stricter penalties for travelling without obtaining the requisite travel permits, as well as being subject to stricter tax obligations. Organisations will need to be equipped with the right information and establish policies and processes to meet more stringent work from anywhere compliance requirements. KPMG's Employment Tax and Immigration professionals can help companies identify tax and immigration issues related to their new employment footprint and the varied compliance requirements this new norm entails. We will also work with our corporate tax colleagues to help businesses assess permanent establishment risks.
