

Every industry, every function, every stakeholder wins

KPMG and Coupa: Better together

Technology applied ineffectively means you can't effectively measure success

Organizations often miss a critical step when kick-starting technology projects. They fail to quantify and measure ROI by defining what success looks like for their business and then measuring it over the long term.

To deliver a strategic advantage, leaders must have a clear technology strategy in place, aligned to their Key Performances Indicators (KPIs) and their business and technology ambitions.

This lack of clarity at the outset can easily lead to ineffective outcomes and over budget transformation programs.
